FACTS ABOUT HORSES' COLORS.

A T present, with pleasure horses in such demand it is up to the breeder to supply the horse which fashion dictates. The sorrel is by far the most favored. Happily the result in the mating of sorrel horses is most satisfactory. As long as a sorrel dam and sire are mated the colts are sure to be sorrel in color. Not so with other mated colors.

Dr. L. P. McCann of the Ohio State University has compiled interesting information about this. When a sire and dam of chestnut are mated it has been proved that three chestnut colts were produced to one sorrel. In the mating of sorrel and chestnut horses the result shows a dominance of sorrel, as follows—23 sorrels, 3 blacks, 1 chestnut and 1 roan. Looking at the matter theoretically, if the two parents should produce a few sorrels, the result would be 23 sorrels to 1 chestnut. The dominance of sorrels over blacks is shown in the sorrel by bay matings, the result being 78 sorrels, 1 bay, 3 browns, 5 chestnuts, 10 blacks and 1 roan.

The sorrel by black matings gives a result similar to the chestnut by black matings. The sorrel by black gives nine sorrels, eight bays, one roan, one chestnut and six blacks, and the chestnut by black union results in one sorrel, two bays, one brown, one roan, one chestnut and one black, showing that sorrel and chestnut are qualitatively alike. The occurrence of the bay offspring from these matings has been explained by Prof. E. N. Wentworth in an article by him entitled "Why Is a Horse Bay?"

He explains that the bay coat is the outcome of red and black pigment in the hair tubules. There is a gray spot connected with the red pigment, which is able to keep the appearance of the black pigment to certain parts of the horse, as the mane, tail, legs and around the eyes. In the case of chestnuts and sorrels, the color of the coat is due to the red pigment alone, but the property of restriction is present. Since you see the red pigment present in the animals, it is because the property cannot exert its force until the black pigment is brought into the cross by the other parent, which is found in the case of black by sorrel matings.

In many cases of the matings of a sorrel and a black, the result is a bay. They not only are sure to produce in the true sorrel by sorrel matings, but appear in large proportion of other colors in the matings of either parent is sorrel.
